Dear Minister,

It was brought to our attention that on January 1st 2007 Croatia passed a law regulation titled Animal Protection Act, which entails a fur farming ban on all animals with a ten year phasing out period. This development was a direct result of crucial support from all political parties and MP's and represents the public opinion with more than 70 percent of Croatian citizens backing such legislation, and corresponds with European wide support for banning such fur production farms.

As an animal welfare organization from the Netherlands, Bont voor Dieren has been closely involved with the development and passing of a national fur farming ban, which has been confirmed by the Higher Court in 2014. Similar to the situation in your country, this ban forbids the breeding of foxes, chinchillas and mink for fur and represents public opinion which no longer accepts the cruelty and lack of animal welfare for the production of fur.

In the Netherlands, the decision to phase out fur production was even more difficult and challenging giving the impact of this decision on the existing fur farms. The Netherlands is after Denmark and China the biggest minkfur producer in the world with an amount of six million mink each year. However, this economic value was no argument for the Dutch government to reject this kind of cruel industry. Public opinion in the Netherlands and in the European Union has been pivotal to the development of the legislation and a strict phasing out period for farmers to adjust to the new situation. As such we are very surprised to hear that the Croatian ban could be diminished by a new amendment to the Animal Protection Act which would exclude chinchillas from the existing ban.

Considering the fact that the transitional period should end in less than a year, this last-minute adjustment would be a clear indication of giving in to the demands of an industry which has had sufficient time to adjust to this new legislation. From a legal point of view, this kind of adjustment would seriously undermine the effectiveness of the law. From an economic point of view, this sends out the adverse signal that the industry is rewarded for stalling and delaying decisions and not responding to national legislation in a proper and timely manner.

In response to concerns of citizens and consumers about the animal welfare aspects of the treatment and killing of animals for fur, several other European member states have adopted or intend to adopt legislation banning fur farms. Croatia has the backing of the following European countries with similar legislation and strict phasing out periods; the Netherlands, UK and Northern Ireland, Germany, Switzerland, Austria, Slovenia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Macedonia.

The Croatian Animal Protection Act should not be changed or diminished by giving in to the minority of farmers who didn't respect and implement the Act contrary to a majority of farmers who did comply and made investments to adhere to the law.

There are ample studies and reports which clearly show that it is impossible to achieve minimal animal welfare standards when breeding animals for fur. We can also provide you with reports detailing the environmental concerns and impact of the fur farming industry as well as the possible hazardous effects of fur products on human health. Independent research in different European countries has recently shown that fur products contain different chemical substances, which has already resulted in a Rapex procedure with a decision by the European Commission to retract fur jackets from the European market.

We applaud the current Croatian Animal Protection Act and we strongly support the implementation of the current law and phasing out of fur farms without making amendments,, thus achieving a higher level of animal protection which corresponds to the level of protection given by other European member states and which sends a consistent and even-handed signal to the industry.

Yours faithfully,

Nicole van Gemert
Director Bont voor Dieren
